ABSTRACT

Introduction: Plaque removal is of utmost importance for control of dental caries and other associated diseases of oral cavity. However, various natural agents have proven their efficacy over chemotherapeutic agents in terms of antibacterial activity against various microorganisms. The effect is mainly due to polyphenol as its major constituent. Aim: In this in vitro study, we aimed to determine the antibacterial efficacy of Trachyspermum ammi oil at different concentrations against five oral bacteria. Hypothesis: Herbal compound, T. ammi oil is effective in reducing five oral plaque-forming bacteria. Materials and Methods: We determined the antimicrobial activity of T. ammi oil (test material) against chlorhexidine (gold standard). Pure cultures of Streptococcus mutans MTCC No 497, Streptococcus oralis MTCC No. 2696, Lactobacillus acidophilus MTCC No. 10307, Lactobacillus fermentum MTCC No. 903, and Candida albicans MTCC No. 183 were obtained and grown in selective culture media. Minimum inhibitory concentration (MIC) and minimum bactericidal concentration (MBC) of both materials were evaluated by serial dilution and disc diffusion method, respectively. Results: Our results revealed that T. ammi oil moderately inhibits bacterial growth with mean MIC of 250, 125, 250, 125, and 250 µg/ml, respectively. Mean MBC for T. ammi oil obtained was 18.60 ± 0.65 , 11.60 ± 1.14 , 14.10 ± 0.55 , 11.50 ± 0.61 , and 15.10 ± 0.74 mm. The MIC and MBC values were higher as compared to chlorhexidine gluconate and it was statistically significant. Conclusion: T. ammi (ajwain) can serve as a potential, natural, nontoxic, and economical therapeutic antiplaque agent.

Introduction

Dental caries is the most common and transmissible disease of childhood having high prevalence all over the world is a multifactorial disease caused due to occurrence and interaction between dental biofilm and oral microflora. This microflora includes primary colonizers as well as secondary colonizers, of which Streptococcus mutans and Streptococcus oralis are one of the early colonizers responsible for plaque formation. S. mutans is considered as bacteria with Abstract Introduction: Numerous antimicrobial agents are used to eliminate oral biofilm. However due to emergence of multi drug resistant microorganisms, the quest to find out biologically safe and naturally available antimicrobial agents continues.

Aim: To evaluate antimicrobial efficacy of silver nano-particles against five common oral pathogenic bacteria.

Objective: To determine antimicrobial activity of silver nanoparticles and chlorhexidine gluconate against oral pathogenic bacteria.

Material and Method: We used strains of Streptococcus mutans (MTCC 497), Streptococcus oralis (MTCC 2696), Lactobacillus acidophilus (MTCC 10307), Lactobacillus fermentum (MTCC 903), and Candida albicans (MTCC 183). We used commercially available silver nanoparticles (experimental group) and chlorhexidine gluconate (positive control). We determined minimum inhibitory concentration (MIC) minimum bactericidal concentration (MBC) of both agents and analyzed the data using paired 't' test, one way ANOVA and Tucky's post Hoc HSD.

Title – EVALUATION OF THE EFFECT OF RECASTING NICKEL-CHROMIUM BASE METAL ALLOY ON THE METAL-CRAMEIC BOND STRENGTH: AN IN VITRO STUDY.

A. Introduction:

Dental casting alloys are commonly used in dentistry because of their strong physical, economical, and biological properties¹. The cast gold was ideal restorative material as it shows properties like resistance to tarnish and corrosion having strength, durability, castability, burnishability, percentage elongation and can be highly polished but due to it's high cost and unesthetic distinguishable color, these alloy is rarely used now a days¹. In 1930, Eardle and Prange introduced base metal alloys².

In dentistry most widely nickel-chromium are used as base for porcelain faced to metal crowns and represent a good alternative to costly precious alloys³. Metal ceramic prostheses have been commonly used in dental applications to combine the esthetics of porcelain with the strength and durability of metal. However, casting of base metal alloys is more difficult than noble alloys because of their high melting range and potential for oxidation during casting⁴. Presently, due to the rise in prices, most of the technicians and clinicians are reusing these base metal alloys¹. The reuse of casting surplus either in part or complete is a routine procedure in dental laboratories to reduce the price of restorations^{5,6}. Metal ceramic prostheses possess clinical longevity because of the strength of the bond between the metal framework and the porcelain⁷. A strong bond between metal and ceramic is critical for maintaining the clinical performance of the restoration.

Superior adhesion of dental porcelain to a metal substrate is created when: a) porcelain wets the metal surface, b) a thin and adherent oxide layer is formed on the metal, and c) surface irregularities are formed on the metal oxide. The formation of a stable oxide layer between the two structures is important for the creation of a strong chemical bond⁹. Ayad stated that the metals like Sn, In, Fe, Cu and Zn present in base metal alloys in small amounts ranging from 0.1% to 14% might get decrease or lost during the recasting through the oxidation or volatilization process^{8,9}. This results in the decrease in the bond strength. The physical properties, microstructure and mechanical properties will be changed after recasting of same dental alloys. According to some authors^{10, 11}, these properties may increase or decrease³. Hence the addition of 50% new alloys to previously melted alloy is recommended for the recasting of metal-ceramic restorations¹². Therefore, need of the study is to identify the changes in physical, microstructure, and mechanical properties that will affect after recasting of the same dental alloys.

Therefore, the purpose of the study is to evaluate the effect of recasting nickel-chromium base metal alloy on the metal-ceramic bond strength.
